Do you know anybody who has the same tastes as you do and would like to create something together? Are you.Q: What does %w(name, age) = @user do? Please explain this line of code: @user = User.new(params[:user]) %w(name, age) = @user I'm new to Ruby and am trying to understand what is happening here. Is this saying to set @user's name to name and @user's age to age? A: That is a definition for the Ruby "hash assignment", or "hash splat". It's not an assignment; it simply sets a variable to the value of all entries in the hash. The line %w(name, age) = @user evaluates to @user = User.new(params[:user]) name, age = @user The @user variable is a "syntactic sugar" to add more scoping. Without it, the variables name and age would be defined in the anonymous scope inside the hash assignmnt, which is why they are nil when they are not used. The %w hash splat is an alternative syntax to declare an array of variables: array = [name, age, name2] The %w hash splat is short for [name, age, name2] = @user A: Here: %w(name, age) = @user The result of this expression is 'name' and 'age' (methods of the String class) which are then assigned to @user. There is no need for the variable assignment @user = User.new(params[:user]), even if it won't cause errors. You should probably omit the assignment, just use the assignment without any arguments, to assign
