The separation of powers doctrine within the United States, as well as the federal system, is protected by Article III of the United States Constitution. In order to prevent this supposed encroachment upon judicial power by Congress, the Supreme Court would later create the broad separation of powers doctrine that has been the standard in American government for nearly 200 years.[27][28] Today, the term separation of powers is used mostly to describe systems of governance in which the government is made up of different branches, each with designated responsibilities, and each possessing the exclusive authority to either exercise or check the other two branches.[29] Each branch "continues to act independently, but their actions can be limited by law and their powers can be limited by the constitutional requirement of separation of powers.[30]
