doctrineThe story of Jasper, Texas, is a lot like the rest of this predominantly rural area west of Dallas — it's been rough for a while, but is picking up. The Amistad Reservoir, which has taken up residence on the Guadalupe River, has brought new opportunity to a town that hasn't seen much of it in recent years. And on Tuesday, the Jasper City Council is set to move forward with the selection of a developer to help turn the reservoir into a hydroelectric project that would create about 100 jobs and be used by the city and surrounding areas for recreational purposes. It's part of an effort to make something out of a barren lot in the middle of town and stop the rumors that the Guadalupe River is too polluted for human use. But with the project already on the fast track, residents say they're wondering how to keep what they've been told is a nuisance from becoming a reality. "I've been here for 41 years and I've seen this city come up. This is my first time ever seeing anything like this," said Ginny Richards, a lifelong resident who lives across the street from the reservoir. Richards' husband, Allen, has been seeing the project coming for more than a year now and says that while he understands the need for change, he wants to make sure the plan is done right. “It’s not going to be easy,” he said. “We’ve just got to make sure we don’t make the same mistakes the city made before.” According to the city of Jasper’s latest master plan, the first phase of the project would include creating an electric generating station and constructing a dam and spillway for the Guadalupe River.

To do that, the project needs to secure funding through the Texas Natural Resource Conservation Commission, which would assign it a priority for funding. That's where the city's short term planning group comes in. The city is hoping the group will issue a request for proposals from developers who would be awarded contracts if the projects makes it to the next step. One of the things the city and the planning group are looking for is whether a developer will be willing to take on responsibility for any damage caused by the new dam. If a developer can promise to
