, Queen of Egypt, Tut-Shrine Tour of a couple of the most interesting and from this side of the world most remarkable places. Our tour started in the morning on 15/8/2009. The flight was short and although it seemed like a lunch break, it was not. When we arrived there we noticed that both of us had different shades of dark black smudges under our eyes. Lunch was Egyptian cucumber soup, which tastes almost neutral and full of cucumber. It was a bit overcooked so I preferred the raw soup, which was still good. It could have been even better. Cooked Dessert Our tour started with a visit to the Temple of King Amenophis III. I was thinking I could find a nice souvenir there, it can be a digression from our urgent schedule. But there was nothing there, at the beginning we were right in the middle of the place where most of the events took place. More interesting, we could not understand the content of the middle part. We only saw the preparation area and a small bit of the temple in general. The girl accompanying our group was not very informative and we were ready to blow our whistle away.

We were watching a scene near the beginning of “One Man’s Hero “. When the ceremony was finished and we passed the temple in general we saw a woman in relation to the man serving me the souvenir. She was a person from the country there. She had a model of the Temple ( i.e. a replica ) in her hands and watching us attentively. Then we were in the temple room where King Thutmose III and Queen Hatshepsut took place. After walking up some steps, we were in the domed ceiling, inside the room. From inside the room we could see some restoration work was going on, that is why there were men cleaning it and fixing stones and joints and making the places more interesting. But they left the place the way it was. It was much more interesting after they left it. Inside it was like in a mad house. Men were cleaning the ceiling and fixing stones and making the places more interesting. Out of the ordinary we saw quite a few things there, incense was hanging in long chains from one end of the room to the other. Not of only one color but of different color. Some of them were still burning and there were some incense powder hanging from them with the smell of a

Role of chloroplast transit peptides in controlling the maturation of protein and the transport of stromal precursor proteins into the stroma. The transit peptide of the barley chloroplast chlorophyll a/b-binding protein functions in the transport of the protein into the chloroplast stroma. It is cleaved by processing proteases when the nascent protein reaches the chloroplast. Processing of a chloroplast precursor protein and transit peptide is the major determinant in the maturation of proteins destined for export to the extracellular or the stroma. Transit peptides are small extensions at the amino termini of proteins that are usually cleaved to allow the mature proteins to enter the chloroplast. We investigated whether chloroplast processing is an intrinsic part of the maturation process of stromal proteins. This is because, in the absence of transit peptide processing, the processing machinery (protease(s)) must either be free to act on processing substrates and translocates stromal proteins into the thylakoids, or else translocates intact mature polypeptides. We investigated whether chloroplast processing functions in chloroplast protein maturation at a protein-transport and/or protein-translocation level. Both indicate that it functions at the latter. We show that processing of the barley chloroplast precursor protein causes truncations in the mature stroma protein. The lack of processing results in stromal precursors being translocated across the chloroplast envelope into the apoplast. Truncations in the mature protein are characteristic of stromal precursors, whereas stop transfer, when the nascent protein stalls, is not. The effect of truncation of stromal precursor proteins has implications for the resolution of membrane-protein homology (TMH) and membrane-protein alignment (MPA) based on the protein-sequence similarity. It is possible to reconstruct the mature polypeptides starting from the envelope membrane of the precursor, whereas truncated precursor sequences cannot be reconstructed.
