Q: RowCountAttribute in Gridview Is there an equivalent (or something along these lines) of the [RowCount] attribute to determine how many rows a GridView has? Currently I'm doing: And then doing the equivalent in the rowdatabound function of checking the Count property: int count = gv.Rows.Count; However, I've noticed that if I restart the application, count does not give me the correct number of rows, so before I pull it out, I'd like to know if this something that is present in the gridview or if my method of using the Count property is correct. Thanks, Kevin A: Aside from examining the RowCount property, there is an extension of the AutoGenerateColumns property available, that automatically adds a rowcount property. Google "ASP

WAITING FOR STEAM / ITUNES www.asiansynthesis.comQ: Detect if File was Uploaded in Django This is what I was wondering and have not found a solution for. I have a file upload form that is being passed to this View class UploadFile(FormView):
template_name = 'uploaded_files/upload_file_form.html'
form_class = UploadFileForm success_url = 'dashboard'
def form_valid(self, form):
print 'uploaded'
return super(UploadFile, self).form_valid(form)
In the template I have a form that when submitted triggers the form_valid function above. The form has multiple forms within it one of which is an input type=file which is a required field. I am trying to figure out how to go about passing a boolean to the view depending on whether the file was uploaded or not. I'm assuming that I'll need to detect this in the form_valid function. If someone could give me a push in the right direction on how to do this I would appreciate it. Thanks! A: If you have a Django model instance with the file field named filename and that instance bff6bb2d33

In order to understand the behavior of silver nanoparticles (SNP) in gastrointestinal tract, ¹³C-labeled SNP were used to study its intake and excretion through rat digestive tract. These SNP were prepared from carboxymethylated gelatin, which was stable at a wide pH range (pH 3-8). It was observed that silver ions were released from the SNP to the medium and thus formed a hydrolysate of silver nitrate. The ingested SNP were not excreted through feces, instead they were absorbed into the body and were distributed in different organs including liver, spleen, lung, kidney and brain. Low levels of SNP were found in feces indicating the difficulty for the excretion of SNP during passage through digestive tract. This result is useful for better understanding the behavior of SNP in vivo. Serotonin regulates ERK1/2 signaling pathway to promote astrocytes migration during the early stage of inflammatory response. Pathological conditions in the central nervous system often result in brain ischemia and promote reactive gliosis. Reactive gliosis following brain ischemia is a highly dynamic process that includes cell migration and proliferation. In this study, we investigated the role of serotonin (5-HT) in the migration of astrocytes in an in vitro model of brain ischemia. We found that after serum starvation, enhanced 5-HT (10-100 μM) induced a concentration-dependent migration of C6 astrocyte cells, which was markedly inhibited by pretreatment with a selective 5-HT₃ receptor antagonist, tropisetron. Serotonin phosphorylated ERK1/2, which was blocked by pretreatment with tropisetron. The expression of 5-HT_{1A} receptor mRNA was not changed by serum starvation but was increased after brain ischemia. Moreover, treatment with the 5-HT_{1A} receptor antagonist, WAY-100635, prevented the enhancement of ERK1/2 signaling and subsequent migration of C6 astrocytes. These results indicate
