did everything he could to help us," he said, "and nothing." I waited and went on. "If there's anything I can do for you or Reg, just let me know." "Do you think you could take us to the village?" "I'd be glad to," he said. "You could try your Rumanian." "We have a car," Reg said. "I mean to do as much work tomorrow as possible. My uncle and I can drive you." "Do you really want to go?" "I haven't been in many of the places I want to see for a long time. And the roads are interesting." "I'll see what I can do," he said. "If it's okay with you, I'll leave my Ford outside." _August 1939_ # 14 DEPARTURE It was warm for the early part of August. In between us and the southern coast lay hills, bright as snow, which we climbed in the early morning sun. Before noon we reached the small village with the gray, adobe church perched in the farmed hills like a child's drawing of Jerusalem. The baker had not remembered the coins we had given him on our last visit and so when we came around for our lunch order he was very busy. "I am sorry," I said. He smiled apologetically. "I will ask him for cash tomorrow, and I am sure he will make arrangements," he said in English. "Come back after your nap. He will still be in the bakery." The dust and stone of the village were brown when the afternoon shadows had begun to move across the road. We stopped the car at the bakery, where there was no bread before the morrow, then went into the church. The owners said they would stop an hour to help us but could not give us exact time. I retorted that if we got so near the goal, it was no longer worth waiting, and the two left. Once again I was struck by the absence of news. Ordinary activity seemed to be going on in this village of six hundred or so. There were even a few strangers in it, three or four men who had just arrived by train. We turned westward, following a road that gave only a glimpse of the hills, then made a bend and saw what had to be one of the most wonderful sights I have ever seen—the Q: What are the benefits of using a vacuum oven? I'm going to be deep frying sea life next semester and would prefer to do my research at home. I've been searching online and I can't tell if there are any benefits to using a vacuum oven and if there is a better option. I've also been searching for information on the materials that can be used but can't find anything. A: Depending how you are planning to deep fry, there are plenty of non-vacuum vessels you can fry in, many of them at least somewhat sealable. Styrofoam or any other workable foam will do, glass, plastic, cans, enameled iron... A big problem with vacuums (w/o perfluorocarbons): you will get leakage of your oil, which will go into the kitchen Nothing you would want to make sure I don't get into the freezer. In terms of ingredients: Aluminum, enamel, or stainless steel is where I start oils and fats should go, as do many condiments, sauces, and spices. oils and fats have a fairly tight seal and go rancid fairly quickly; you won't be replacing them regularly. for food, just do a blind taste test before and after, and you'll know. More than that, they are usually greasier. be careful not to pop the vacuum under the pan. You could get a vacuum leak, and that oil will go out.
