If you are not logged in you will be able to access this content. Lately I have been away from the computer while you guys did some editing and uploading..We have a lot of cool stuff we wanted to show you this week at the Google I/O conference keynote in San Francisco, but we didn't actually get a chance to give it all to you.

So instead, here's an awesome little teaser of what we have working for Google Maps: transit directions and real-time traffic, with a killer feature that's actually been in the works since way back before Street View was a thing. You know what? We're not going to waste your time with that ridiculous design language talk again. Okay, that's a new batch of Google Maps Android goodness from some of the hardest working engineers on the planet. Google Maps now has the ability to detect public transit stops for you. This is certainly an example of how the addition of access to tons of public data can add a whole lot of value to a well-made app. In other words, it's a crowdsourcing move.
