Tomato Way is a heritage-listed grounds at 18-20 Grosvenor Street, Leeton, Leeton Shire, New South Wales, Australia. It was designed by Banks and Pritchard. The property is owned by NSW Office of Environment and Heritage. It was added to the New South Wales State Heritage Register on 2 April 1999. History Leeton is a New South Wales village situated on the northern shore of Bateup, near the junction of the railway and Murrumbidgee rivers. Nearby settlements include the railway station at Glendowie and the town of Marysville on the Newell Highway. At one time many buildings in Leeton were constructed with timber from the forest around nearby Broken Hill but this resource has now depleted. Fruit became an important part of Leeton's economy with the introduction of the town's first orchards in the 1860s. In 1869 breadfruit became the main crop and the area was "very celebrated on account of the large quantities produced during the late war" (Leeton Shire Council Archives). The settlement of Leeton was established in 1854 after the construction of the railway line between the Murrumbidgee and Darling Rivers. Natives of the area are the Canggarriga people (Cangaranga people) and the Gubbi Gubbi people. Like similar European settlements around New England, New South Wales and Victoria, many of the early migrants to the Leeton district were people of English origin who were seeking a new life. One of those people was William Heap, who arrived in Leeton in 1850 with his wife Ann and seven children. The arrivals were blessed with good land, friendly local inhabitants, plenty of labour

but did not have a water supply. In order to survive, William made a pact with the local Aboriginal people, which resulted in a lengthy search for a water supply. Their determination and perseverance is still remembered today, despite the bushfires that destroyed most of Leeton in the 1890s. The land on which Leeton sits is rich in mineral and archaeological resources. Alluvial gold lies near the Murrumbidgee River and there have also been copper discoveries, giving rise to the famous Broken Hill. In the 1860s agricultural settlement began in the area, where he dams were used to establish grassed areas to provide grazing. At this time the land continued to be used for vegetation for more than 40 years. George Morehead,
