Disturbance of the afferent vestibular-nerve pathway in sensorineural deafness. An experimental study on the vestibulocochlear nerve in human subjects was carried out, to evaluate the existence of a disturbance of the afferent vestibular-nerve pathway (AVN) in sensorineural deafness. These experiments comprised anatomological study with light microscope on specimens from the cochlea of human cadaver bodies which were used in the study and measurement of the function of the AVN and examination of the morphology and changes of the AVN in inner ears of patients with sensorineural deafness. For the anatomical study, a vestibulocochlear nerve in human cadaver bodies was used which was demonstrated by de Noe; the place where the vestibulocochlear nerve terminated was located at the internal auditory meatus, which was usually divided into three segments; the anterior, middle, and posterior. The function of the AVN was examined by recording a compound action potential (CAP) from the round window and stapes, by means of electronystagmography. In the results of the anatomological study, the A-phase, showing a wave type potential, had been recorded in the round window, which suggested the existence of the AVN. The CAP measurement showed, in both ears of normal hearing subjects, an ENG recording with the CAP. But in patients with sensorineural deafness, in both ears, the CAP was not evoked. Especially in patients whose deafness was developed after their teens, in both ears, the ENG recording was not evoked. This result of the present study suggests that the AVN is disturbed or changes after the development of sensorineural deafness. Social media giant Facebook will pay up to $1 billion to settle a lawsuit accusing it of helping spread “fake news” about a U.S. political candidate during the presidential election, according to sources familiar with the negotiations. The company has agreed to settle a lawsuit brought by the U.S. District Court in San Jose, California, the sources said. A settlement could come within a few weeks, the sources said. The terms of the settlement are not known, nor is how much of the $1 billion will go to a nonprofit center devoted to better understanding the spread of misinformation on the internet. Social media companies including Facebook Inc. have been under increased scrutiny since Russian agents used them to sow dissent
