I Submitted by Michael K. on January 28, 2007 - 4:27am New Jersey Michael and his squad were preparing for a possible emergency hostage situation. He was anxiously waiting for a call from an officer in a potential hostage rescue situation when the phone rang. Commander Williams answered and spoke with the officer, who informed him there was a dangerous meth lab inside a house being cooked. Williams had his men check the perimeter of the house, and then notify the DEA and the narcotics unit. They decided not to approach the house initially; instead, they called in a bomb squad to make sure that they didn't have to go in. The bomb squad advised they would not enter the house unless directed, and the tactical squad was going to wait it out for the bomb squad. As the DEA and narcotics officers started approaching the house, Michael's team finally started shooting. Suddenly, a shot was fired, and the DEA and narcotics officers began returning fire. Chaos ensued, and shots were fired from inside the house. Eventually, Michael's team was able to make entry. "My team worked well in conjunction with the DEA and narcotics officers during the execution of this valid search warrant. We had hostages tied on a dining room table and another tied in a dining room closet. Notwithstanding the fact that there was an armed and dangerous subject inside the house, we had a clear plan of action to deal with and executed it as required. "The single greatest lesson I learned in this exercise was to have a plan. The success we had in this operation was critical, because no plan is meant to be foolproof. Once that plan was put into action, everything else followed, and everybody's minds were focused on the task at hand – survival," says Michael. Vermont Camp Williams was the site of the March 16, 2005, arrest of six alleged members of the drug gangs La Familia and the Varrio Knights for charges stemming from the alleged attack on a relative of a member of the Frelinghuysen family. Four of the six alleged members were arrested in New Jersey under their New Jersey indictments and four others were arrested in Georgia. At this point, the lead New Jersey agent was Robert M. Muniz, and his case agent was Michael J. Grant of the Oneida Tribal Police Department. Muniz and Grant quickly realized that the entire operation would have to be moved to Vermont to avoid difficulties
