& Despair Haunted houses make up one of the most popular attractions at Halloween. Whether you're searching for fun or a scary experience, haunted houses can satisfy both interests. When you step inside a haunted house, you simply want to be scared. Like all attractions that offer the opportunity to be scared, Halloween haunts are not intended for children under the age of 14. Yet, haunted houses are much larger than golf, hockey or football fields. The size of a haunted house can be six times the size of a football field. An incredible amount of money, manpower, skills and time is devoted to the design, build, and operation of a haunted house. Many personal friends from within the community get involved to develop a personality for their haunted house. This personal touch, along with its ultimate objective - to provide an enjoyable fright, makes haunted houses unique. A child can walk right up to and touch a bloody knife or a dead body in a haunted house. How often can you do that at a hockey or golf game? Halloween haunts are available in nearly every state in the U.S., and in some cases, around the world. Many haunt operators have a house in more than one state. It's common for haunted houses to travel to the next state within the same season, then return to their home state in another season. This type of rotating lineup helps operators address crowd issues by staying within a given region's peak season. Interest in Haunted Houses Halloween has been a popular Halloween season event for generations. Its popularity is not likely to wane any time soon. During its peak seasons, the number of visitors to a Halloween haunt may reach 4.5 to 5 million. During the next off-peak season, visitation may drop to two million or less. There are various methods for pricing a haunted house. Some operators depend upon scare-charge admission. Others might project their entire budget onto the front gate fence as a scare charge. A small haunted house can probably charge three or four dollars per person. Because Halloween is a major time of year for most haunted houses, they are relatively busy for most of the year. Halloween weekends can bring throngs of tourists to some haunts, further loading their calendars with extra guests. Halloween theme parks have been popular for decades. Fast-paced amusement parks spend most of their money on rides and games and hope to make a profit on food, souvenirs and advertising. Haunted houses are not amusement parks. They are unique
